Breaking the Cycle of Bullying and Harassment for Students (excerpt from the St Mary's College Behaviour Support Plan)

The intent to cause harm, imbalances of power and repetition of inappropriate behaviours all need addressing if the cycle of bullying and harassment is to be broken. It is also essential that learning always occurs when school processes and procedures are applied in each instance. Both the students exhibiting these behaviours and those experiencing these behaviours have a right to develop strategies which will enable them to effectively engage in life after school.

Empathy – the key to addressing the intent to cause harm and imbalances of power

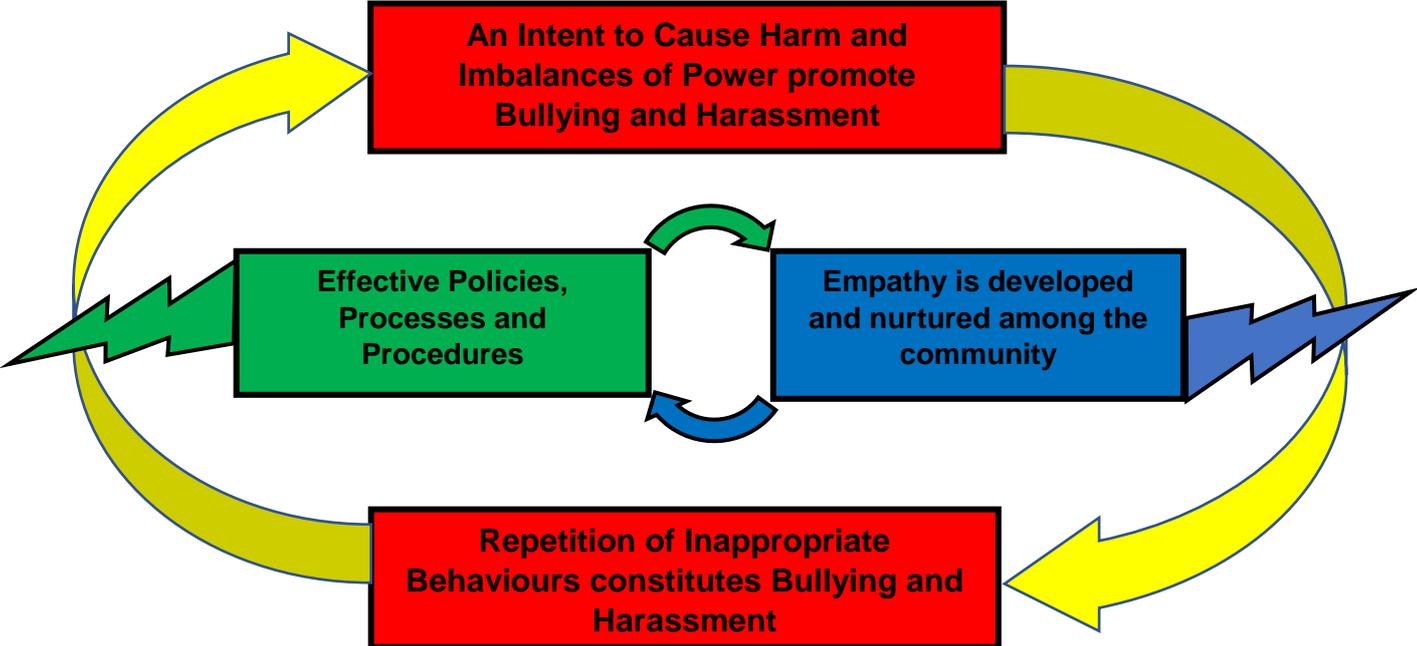

Studies show that bullies quite often have very low self-esteem which explains their need to position themselves above other, perceived 'weaker' individuals to make them feel better about themselves. Having low self-esteem also means that people who bully quite often rely on others for their power base. Developing empathy among community members is essential if this power base is to be reduced. While studies have shown that people who bully struggle with empathy (which further explains their behaviour), the key is to develop empathy among all students through inclusive and multi-faceted practices. This drastically reduces any intent to cause harm which in turn reduces the number of students prepared to support the bully and their behaviour. Without 'bystanders' and 'cronies' the bully's powerbase is seriously eroded.

Effective processes and procedures – the key to addressing ongoing inappropriate behaviours

People who are experiencing bullying or harassment are constantly supported and encouraged through dedicated pastoral programs to seek assistance. Other members of our community are encouraged to speak up on their behalf with many opportunities provided including our Safe School Survey and 'Red Button'. Students can then be empowered by wrap-around support networks thus tipping the imbalance of power in their favour.

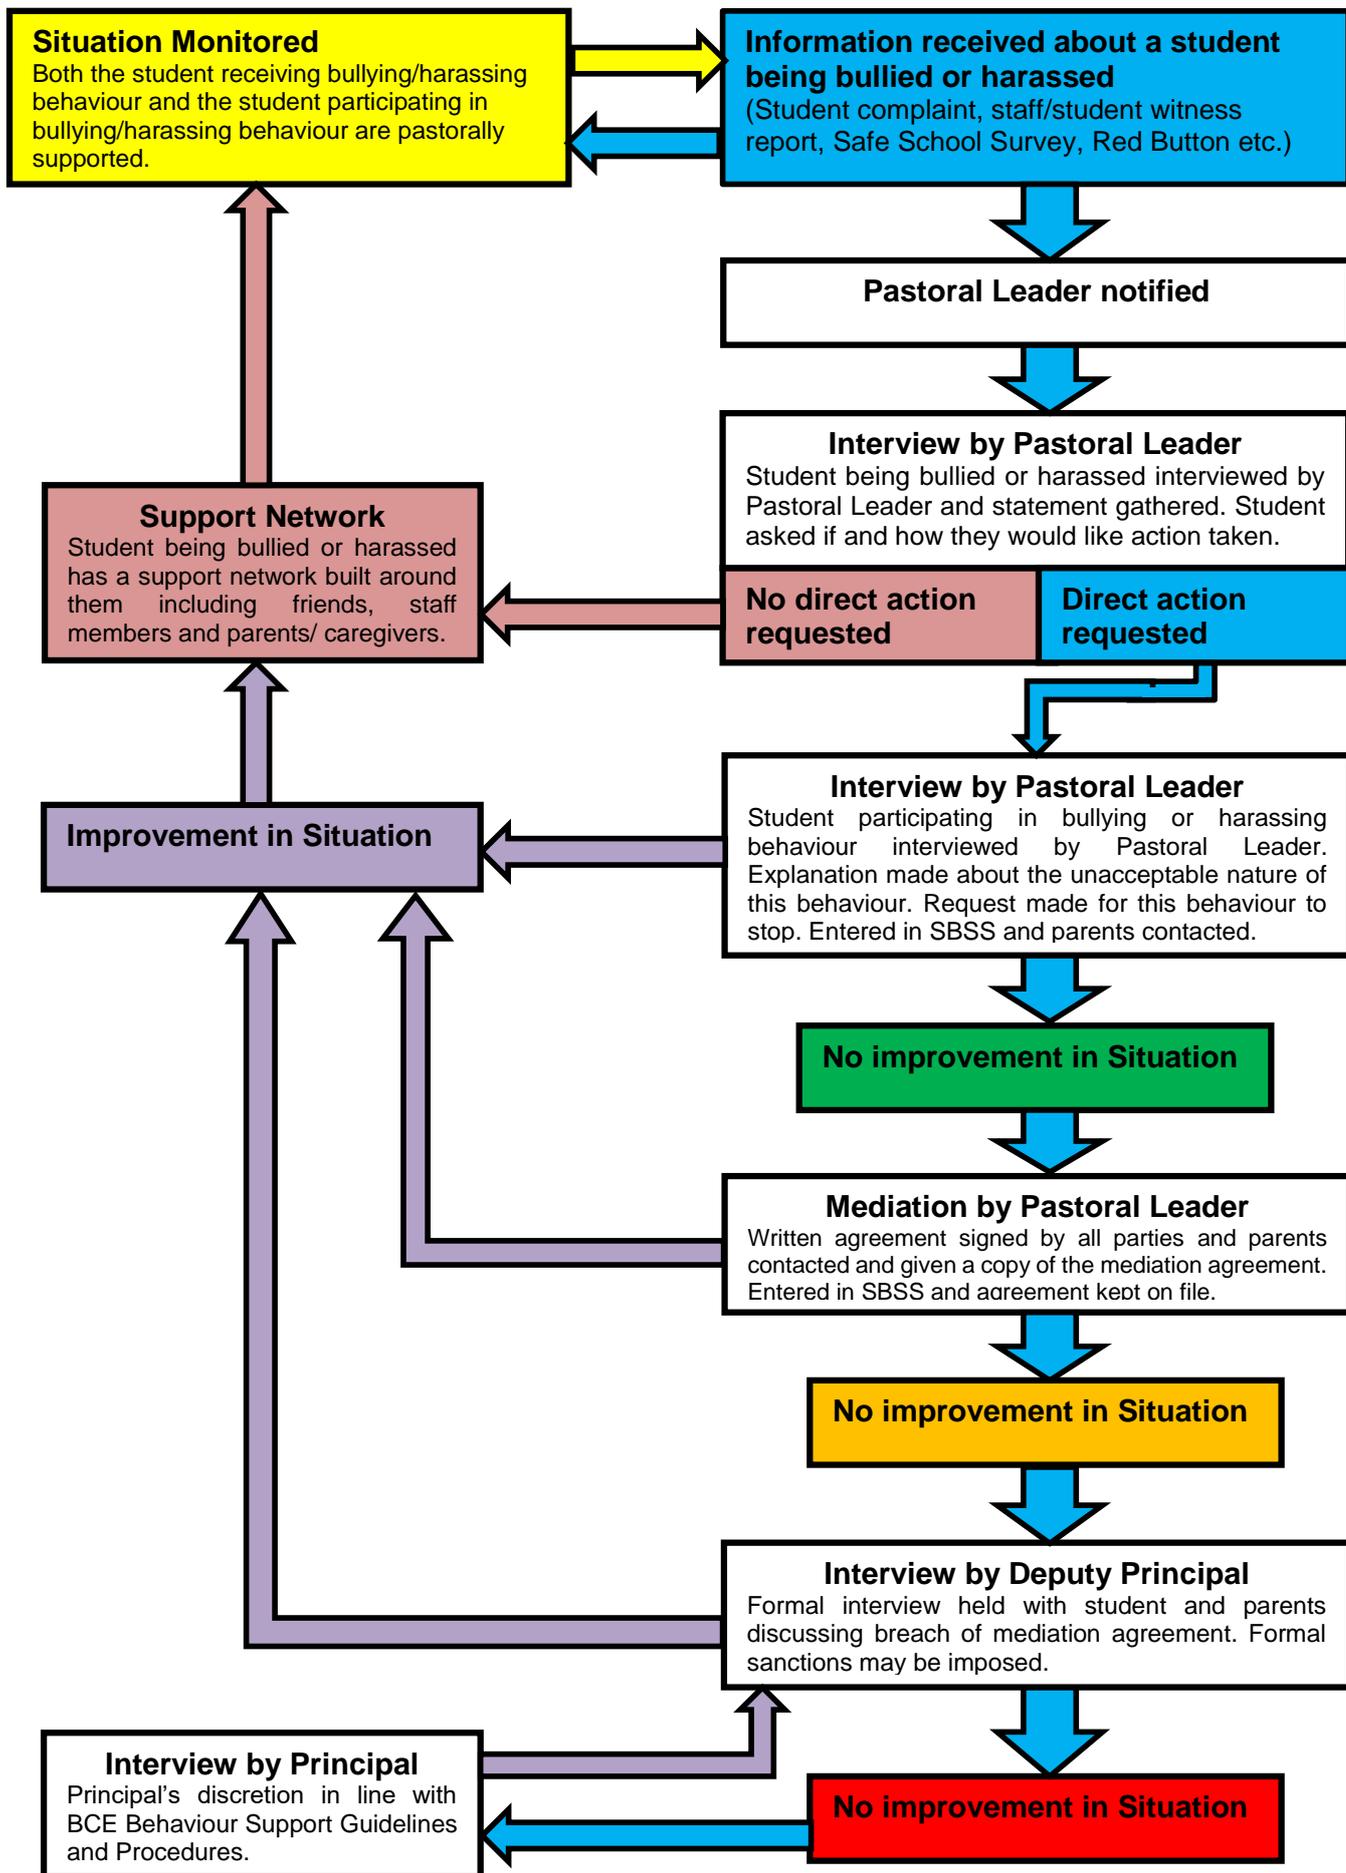

Is essential that addressing bullying and harassing behaviours is approached from a whole school perspective. The college's Behaviour Support Plan and Bullying and Harassment Policy and associated procedures underpin this approach. Effective communication between students, staff and parents is paramount to ensuring that together we can make a stand against bullying and harassment.
